

DD21 will gather international researchers and representatives of mathematicians, scientists, and engineers working on various aspects of domain decomposition methods.

An opportunity for you to communicate your latest developments and to share the latest advances in this field.

A n international audience

DD21 is the twenty-first edition of the major international conference on the domain decomposition. Located in Rennes, France, this event will have an international audience of about 150 people. It is organized jointly by INRIA and the university of Caen and will be held on June 2012 in the historical and art city of Rennes, France. Domain decomposition is an active, interdisciplinary research area concerned with the development, analysis, and implementation of coupling and decoupling strategies in mathematical and computational models of natural and engineered systems.
